Now, I'm going to try and sum up at least part of what I'm having trouble actually saying – the great, always-fascinating Labour For Reform v Tory Reform Programme What is the difference between Labour for Reform and the Tory Reform Programme? Well, there's much, much more to it than meets the eye. It is easy to see that the programme could be easily written off as a 'compromise' to be adopted by a Labour Government in their on-going struggle against the civil servants and the 'spin doctors', but that is not the case. Labour for Reform has some components which will not survive the Conservatives, but others that could (and should) survive the Conservatives – if we could only get them to understand that a libertarian does not automatically lead to a Libertarian Socialist. For one thing, after long arguments and misunderstandings, we finally managed to agree on a single market (largely because George Rotherham argued that we should). This is critical, since it means we are able to start introducing all the things in the programme that we share without the usual border-to-border disagreement which prevents us ever getting round the fact that the economic and the social are very much intertwined, and that you cannot have capitalism without some form of 'compulsory social security' – public services like education. We also agree on a common monetary policy, though we have some very significant differences over this. As for the fiscal policy, I think that it is necessary to add a reference to the Palmer Report. It seems to me quite possible that the policy proposed in their report to the Treasury would be very similar to the policy which we are developing. A third thing is not so easy to identify. It is the argument which George Rotherham has been putting across from the time we first met, that people who do not want to run things badly need to have a realistic chance of winning an election. That means that people cannot be in or out of office at will. This extends
