How to manage infant disorders at home: a clinical review. Although improving access to affordable health care, the number of infants in the United States living in poverty has increased to 12% by 2006. To further reduce the infant mortality rate, the Infant Parent Nursing Program at the University of Pennsylvania School of Nursing, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, developed a home management curriculum to teach community nurses to provide primary nursing care to infants and families experiencing infant disorders. The authors review and assess the efficacy of this evidence-based infant disorder management education program.
